Ans-1 Preferences in Outdoor Sports

The given double bar graph shows the performance of children in a school in playing games over a period of 6 years that is from 2014 to 2019. The graph shows that the highest number of children interested in playing volleyball was maximum in the year 2016, whereas in the year 2019 it dropped down to the lowest. Less variability has been observed with regard to basketball like in the year 2014 and 2017, same number of students showed interests in it. Basketball got a slike hieght of interest in the year 2016 but a decline was seen in the year 2019. If we observ the graph we can see that the preference related to volleyball is continously fluctuating every year. The greatest hike of 400 in 2016 and a decline to 150 in 2019 illustrates differences in interest over the period. To conclude, the data shows that throughout the 6 years basketball was preferred more in comparison to volleyball.

Population Growth

Ans Population growth significantly impacts societal dynamics. As the population rises, the demand for essential resources like food, water, and energy increases, placing immense pressure on natural reserves and the environment. This surge in consumption leads to intensified production often at the cost of sustainability. Additionally, migration - driven by uneven resource distribution - creates imbalance in affected regions. With more people, the need for safety and security escalates, prompting greater investments in protective measures. These hightened security requirements further amplify societal demands, including infrastructure, healthcare, and governance. Thus, population growth triggers a chain reaction, influencing resource mangement, migration patterns, and societal structures, ultimately shaping the future of human developement and environmental sustainability.
