II Answer the following Short Answers:-

Q1 why do the trees need to move out? where have they been and why?

Ans The trees need to move out because they were uprooted from their natural forest habitat and kept in cramped city houses for decoration, leaving them suffocated and longing for freedom. Planted in courtyards and pots, their roots and branches strain against walls. They must return to the forest where they belong.

Q2 what kind of whispers are the poet hears? why they will be silent tomorrow?

Ans The poet hears the soft conversations of the trees as they struggle to reclaim freedom - roots straining, leaves murmuring against glass, and branches creaking under the roof. These whispers will be silent tomorrow because the trees will have broken free from their confines and returned to the forest, ceasing their desperate, hushed rebellion.

Q3 what are the 3 things that can not happen in a forest without trees?

Ans In a forest without trees, birds would have no branches on which to perch, leaving the canopy eerily silent. Insects would lose their foliage hideouts, stripping the forest floor of its bustling diversity. Ans Adrienne Rich portrays the trees uprooted and confined as "newly discharged patients", whose roots work to disengage from veranda cracks. This vivid image stands for women trapped indoors by patriarchal norms, yearning to return to the wild freedom of their true selves.

Their leaves strain against glass and stiff boughs shuffle under the roof like half-dazed patients - an image of exhausted yet determined revival. This struggle mirrors women pushing against social barriers, reclaiming agency and identity after years of repression.

As moonlight shards flash in the tallest oak's crown and glass shatters, the poem's final movement celebrates liberation. The tree's triumphant exodus into the forest echoes women's emancipatory journey from silence to self-determined existence.
